“Police executives will find themselves relying more and more on quality analysis to help inform their decisions. The Police Foundation’s Symposium on Crime Analysis provides Chiefs with the information needed to build and enhance their departments’ analytical capacity.”

Nola Joyce, Deputy Commissioner
Philadelphia Police Department

■ Learn How Crime Analysis Can Make Your Agency More Productive

The symposium is funded by the United States Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Assistance. The Police Foundation and the International Association of Crime Analysts invite law enforcement executives to a highly-informative symposium that will provide them an overview of crime analysis best practices and organizational considerations necessary to integrate crime analysis and evidence-based policing strategies into their agencies’ everyday practices, making them more effective and efficient in reducing crime in their communities.

■ Bringing Science into Practice

Executives will be shown how to focus their use of crime analysis by matching the appropriate type of analysis to the appropriate rank and division in the agency, so that crime reduction at all levels is informed by actionable crime analysis. The expert team of presenters – a police executive, one criminologist, and a crime analyst - will explore how agencies of all sizes can integrate approaches such as problem-oriented policing, hot-spots policing, community policing, predictive policing and intelligence-led policing.

■ Highly Practical

The one-day symposium coming in Spring 2015 will include discussions about “what works,” and will make recommendations based on nationally recognized best practices. The first symposium in Cambridge, Massachusetts, attracted executives from throughout the region. Several more symposiums will be scheduled later in 2015.
